ADVISORY COMMITTEE ON RECONSTRUCTION

A Brief Selected List of Comprehensive

JUL 18 1944

Guides for Post-War Reconstruction Studies

The number of pamphlets and small books which attempt to give an outline of all the topics which are part of post-war reconstruction, is now growing so large that a comprehensive catalogue is not possible. The few listed here are selected for their usefulness in indicating the major outlines and several branches of the subject rather than one or a few particular aspects; and also for illustrating different approaches to this comprehensive treatment.

It is important to note the distinction between international and domestic policies. While in practice these are necessarily interconnected, nevertheless much of the literature which undertakes a general discussion of "the post-war problem" is largely confined to the first mentioned aspect. (For a more extended list of these see special Bibliography A). Booklets dealing systematically with the principal domestic applications of policy are much fewer, and it is with these that the present list is particularly concerned.

References which attempt a balanced exposition of both international and domestic branches of policy are indicated by an asterisk in the first group.

For more detail on the main branches of domestic policy, the reader is referred to the following:

- 2 A. Postwar reconstruction: international aspects.
- 3 B. Bibliography on Full Employment: Economic Policy.
- 4 C. Bibliography on Industrial Reconstruction.
- 5 D. Bibliography on Works Programmes.
- 6 E. Bibliography on Housing and Town Planning.
- 7 F. Bibliography on Conservation and Natural Resources.
- 8 G. Bibliography on Social Security. [Supplement only issued]

WORKS PROJECTS AND PUBLIC INVESTMENT PROGRAMMES

N.B. Because "public works" may mean anything from the emergency relief works for unskilled labour made familiar in depression years, all the way to the economics of planned national and international public investment policies, there is much confusion and loose thinking on this important topic. Naturally, articles and references on post-war may cover various aspects, but the following divisions of the subject are distinguished here as a matter of convenience: (1) discussions concerned primarily with the types of projects which ought to be or have been part of a programme; (2) programmes or principles particularly concerned with the development or conservation of natural resources; (3) aspects which are primarily administrative - the actual techniques of planning, either on a national or local scale; (4) the basic economics of public investment or (human and natural) resource development programmes. On the special subjects of housing and town planning, the reader is referred to the Selected Bibliography E. A more detailed reference list on natural resources development is given in Selected Bibliography F.

II. Housing.

1. General Principles and Comprehensive Treatments.

- Bauer, Catherine. Modern housing. New York, Houghton Mifflin, 1934. 330 pp.
Based on a recent first-hand study of European housing in the light of the possible application of its methods to the United States. Prefaced by a survey of the failure of nineteenth century housing practice here and abroad, this volume sets forth the methods, accomplishments, and ideals of modern housing. Discussions of housing standards, city and neighborhood design, architecture, construction, slum clearance, and the economics of housing are included, as well as a bibliography containing many references on European housing.

International Labour Office. The housing situation in the United States. Geneva, The League, 1925. 53 pp.

Wood, Edith Elmer. Recent trends in American housing. New York, Macmillan, 1931. 297 pp.
The story of housing advance for low-wage earners in America from 1917 to 1931. The introduction briefly analyzes the economics of housing to show the reason for existing housing conditions, and their accompanying problems in American cities. The book tells in a comprehensive fashion of the steps that had been taken, or, at the time of its publication, were contemplated in various parts of the country to meet this need. Valuable today not only as a background for understanding present housing trends, but as a source book on the legal, financial and administrative devices (their accomplishments and their failures) that had been developed in this country prior to 1931 in an effort to meet the housing needs of the lower income group.

Housing America. By the editors of Fortune. New York, Harcourt Brace, 1932. 155 pp.
A readable and dramatic analysis of the factors that have put modern housing beyond the reach of two-thirds of the population. Among them are the high cost of land, extravagant construction practices, high wages in the building trades, and excessive financing charges. The book suggests that the excessive costs of the buildings can be eliminated by industry itself through prefabrication and large-scale operations, but indicates that the problem of the high cost of land can be solved only through governmental cooperation.

Mayer, Albert, Wright, Henry and Mumford, Lewis. New homes for a new deal. Reprinted from The New Republic (New York), February 14 - March 7, 1934. 46 pp.
A three-fold housing programme outlining the need for new neighborhood developments on unbuilt land as well as for slum clearance and rehabilitation of blighted areas. It also stresses the need for control to prevent speculative subdivision and jerrybuilding that may create new slums on the outskirts of our cities faster than the old slums can be cleared. The pamphlet shows clearly the necessity of viewing housing problems in a comprehensive way.
